Excerpt: . . . tors, who never pretended to the gift of prophecy, have done more towards a rational and scientific application of the Old Testament to the New, than ever the primitive fathers did. With respect to the foreseeing the fates of the church, already mentioned as part of the gift of prophecy, it does not appear that the fathers had any further knowledge of th. it subject than what they obtained from the sacred canon. But it may be said, that some of the primitive Christians, after the apostolical age, might have had the gift of prophecy, although the fathers themselves had it not. This, however, is exceedingly improbable: for, had such been the fact, the fathers would have given frequent and unequivocal testimony to it. But there hardly appears a vestige of any thing of that nature, even in the writings of the fathers who...
